

Gaelyn Rosenberg at the Lennon Wall, Prague

In spring 2013, I studied at a renowned Anglo-American University, situated in the heart of Prague, through a program called CEA Global Education. Being an English major turned out to have many advantages. One of the classes I enrolled in, “Literature as Social Critique,” asked students to grapple with timeless issues of social justice—a primary focus of Lehigh’s English Department—assessing texts that provide various critiques of society. I also took a course on “Psychoanalysis & Literature.” I’m grateful to have had the opportunity to take courses that challenged me to think beyond the boundaries of my own discipline, although my skills of literary analysis served me well. Studying abroad in Prague was one of the wisest decisions I’ve made in my educational career.
